related programs are considered simulaneously. To ensure that the reviews are serious, spending authority would terminate unless Congress acts to renew or continue the program.
Sunset will make a crucial contribution to the effort to cut the waste from government regulation and government spending. An excellent sunset bill passed the Senate last year. With the addition of sunset reviews for Federal tax expenditures, this legislation will make a great difference to effective management. I urge Congress to put it into law.

In addition, my Administration will work with Congress this year to reform several individual regulatory statutes. We have submitted the first of our proposals to reduce economic regulation of surface transportation. We will submit legislation on drugs, nuclear plant siting, meat and industry inspection and other areas. And we will work with Congress on bills al-dead introduced to revamp regulation of communications.

To reform regulation, we and Congress must act in partnership, within our respective spheres of responsibility under the Constitution. The program I have described follows that principle. From Congress, it asks reform of underlying statutes and modernization of the ground rules for administering them. From me, and from the agency heads I have appointed to help execute the laws, it demands competent management and coordination.

I ask Congress to join me in this effort and to refrain from seeking authority to veto individual regulatory decisions and thereby to administer the laws itself. The legislative veto is an illusory solution to the problems of regulation. In some cases it would make rules weaker; in others it would make them stricter. But in all cases, it would increase delay, undermine fair procedures, and fragment responsibilities.

It would disrupt our effort to manage the regulatory process, and it would distract Congress from the fundamental job of reforming underlying statutes. Any serious effort to administer the legislative veto would require a major increase in congressional staff and threaten the Constitutional division of power.

The program I am proposing will not solve all the problems overnight. But these two steps will make regulation a more effective tool to improve our lives. They will help get needless rules and paperwork off our backs, and they will help marshal our resources to attack the real problems with maximum efficiency. By doing so, they will help us advance our national commitment to the regulatory goals we all believe in—a healthier, safer and fairer America.
